(U) CHINA: POSSIBLE CENTRAL COMMITTEE
CHANGES THIS YEAR

Summary

In several interviews with foreign journalists during recent months, party General Secretary Hu Yaobang has revealed that a substantial proportion of current Communist Party Central Committee members--10-15 percent, according to one statement, and about 60 people, according to another--would be replaced. In one interview, Hu also suggested that both the Politburo and the Secretariat would see some retirements as China seeks to rejuvenate its aging leadership and effect a transition to young reformers who can lead China into the 21st century. Recent personnel changes in the central government, provincial party and government structures, and the military seem to have furthered this goal considerably and suggest the possible contours of the Central Committee after this September's party representative meeting.

Army, Government, and Party Changeovers Already Made

One of Deng Xiaoping's long-term goals has been to weed out from the leadership aged, incompetent, and recalcitrant leaders and to replace them with younger, better educated, more technologically sophisticated, and reform-oriented cadres. The People's Liberation Army (PLA) especially has undergone major high-level changes as old guerrilla fighters have stepped aside (willingly or not) to make room for remarkably young and little-known men. Nine new central government ministers recently have been appointed, and a large number of provincial party secretaries and governors have been replaced by younger men and women, most moving up within their provincial apparatus.

Top Strata Changes Unlikely

The extent of future changes in the very senior leadership remains unclear. While some retirements and several promotions are likely in both the Politburo and the Secretariat, it seems unlikely that major changes will take place at the apex--the Politburo's elite six-man Standing Committee.

Prospective Changes

Central Committee full members fall into three categories, as indicated on the accompanying lists: those who are likely to remain on the Central Committee, those likely to be retired or removed, and those who possibly could be retired or removed. In addition, 26 current alternate Central Committee members are likely to be promoted to full membership and about two dozen young officials are on the rise and likely will gain either alternate or full membership in September.

These categories assume that officials recently retired from a substantive post such as provincial secretary, minister in the central government, or a military position will retire from the Central Committee. The lists also assume that replacements for the most part will be elevated from alternate status or will join the Central Committee either as alternate or full members. Individuals whose age or inactivity suggest that they may soon lose their substantive post are possible retirement candidates, as are elderly or semi-active Politburo and Secretariat members, as well as a few known opponents of the reformers who are assumed to be targeted for removal.

Those likely to remain include recently appointed or reappointed officials; young technocrats; and key reform supporters, even if elderly, who are not expected to retire from substantive posts (such as Wang Enmao in Xinjiang and Yang Shangkun in the Military Commission). Among those expected to be promoted from alternate to full membership, or from no membership to either alternate or full status, are recently promoted provincial party and government officials, a few new central government ministers, and several newly appointed central and regional military officials.

In general, no systematic assessment of alternate members was attempted other than to identify those likely to be promoted. Many of the alternates are unknown or little known.
